"I will go and lend a hand at those pumps,"

Jacob Carey said.
"It's not the slightest use," Mr. Armstrong replied. "You might as well try to blow out that fire with your breath as to put it out by throwing a few pails of water out. Let us see that everyone is out first; that's the main matter."

They joined a group of men and women, who were standing looking at the flames; they were the two women, the groom and gardener, and four or five men who had already come up

"I shouldn't wonder if that was it," the smith said. 'It's not natural that the fire should have spread all over the lower part of the house in such a short time. You know what we were saying this evening. It's just the sort of trick for a madman to play."

The smith was interrupted by a sudden exclamation from those standing round, followed by a shout of "There he is." A dormer window on the roof of the oldest part of the house opened, and a figure stepped out on to a low parapet that ran round the house.

"All right, sir, all right," Jacob Carey shouted out at the tomor his voice. "wently have the tomor his voice."

With the aid of a dozen men—for the whole village was now upon the spot—the ladder was agrain lifted, and aropped so that the upper end fell between a chimney and dormer window. Reginald Carne agrain attempted to cast it down, but a number of men hung on to the lower part of the ladder, and he was unable to litt it far enough to get it out of the niche into which it had fallen. Then he turned round and shook his fist at the crowd. Something flashed in the light of the flames, and half a dozen voices exclaimed—"He has got a knife." At this moment the clergyman and doctor arrived together on the scene.

"What's to be done, doctor?" Jacob Carey asked.

There could be no doubt of that. Reginald Carne, seeing that his assailants, as he considered them, could not get at him, was making gestures of triumph and derision at them. Now from the second-floor windows the flames began to spurt out, the glass clattering down on the gravel below.

"Oh, father, what a pitiful sight!"
Mr. Armstrong turned. "What on earth

"I have seen more shocking things, father," she said quietly. "Why did you not bring me up with you at first." I ran upstairs to got my hat and shawl, and when I came back you were gone. Of course, I came up at once, just as everyone else in the village has done, only I would not come and bother you when I thought you were going to do something. But there's nothing to be done now but wait. This must surely be the end of the Curse of Carne's Hold, father?"

"It ought to be, my dear. Yes, let us earn-estly hope that it all terminates here for your sake and everyone else's. Mervyn will be mas-ter of Carne's Hold now."

"Not of Carne's Hold, thank God!" the girl said with a shudder. "There will be nothing left of Carne's Hold to-morrow but a beap of runis. The place will be destroyed before he becomes its master. It all ends together, the Hold and the direct line of the Carnes."

"Let us turn and walk away, Mary. This is too dreadful."

ing out through the roof now in several places.

"It will not be long before the roof falls through," Mr. Armstrong said. "Come away. Mary. I will not let you stay here any longer." Putting his arms round his daughter, he led her away. She had not gone ten steps where there was a tremendous crash. She looked back; the roof was gone and a volcano of flame and sparks was rising from the shell of the house. Against these the figure of the madman stood out black and clear. Then a sudden puff of wind whirled the flames round him. He stag gered, made a half step backward and fell. while a cry went up from the crowd.

"It's all over, dear," Mr. Armstrong said, releasing his hold of his daughter; and then with Jacob Carey and three or four other men, he ran forward to the house, lifted the body of Reginald Carne up and carried it beyond danger of a falling wall.

Dr. Arrowsmith and the dergyman and several of tee neighbors at once hurried to the were the and four or five men who and four or five men who and four or five men who are from the village.

The gardener was speaking.

"It's no use to work at the pumps; there are only four or five pails. If it was only at one end we might prevent its spreading, but it's got hold all over."

"I can't make it out," the groom said. "One of the horses was sick, and I was down there giving him hot fomentations with the other groom. I had been there perhaps an hour when you a light coming out of the drawing room was abouting; and then I saw eral of tee neighbors at once

"He is not dead," Jacob Carey said, as they came up; "he groaned when we lifted him; he fell on to not of the little flower beds between the windows."

"No, his heart is beating," the doctor said, as he knelt beside him and felt his pulse," but I fear that he most have sustained fatal injuries."
He took out a flask that he had, thinking that a cordial might be required, slipped into his pocket just before starting for the scene of the fire and coursel a few draws of spirit between fire, and poured a few drops of spirit between Reginald Carne's lips.

There was a faint groan, and a minute later he opened his eyes. He looked round in a be-wildered way, but when his eye fell on the burn-ing house a look of satisfaction passed over his

of the horses was sick, and I was down there giving him hot fomentations with the other groom. I had been there perhaps an hour when I saw a light coming out of the drawing room window, and I ran up shouting; and then I saw there was a light in the dining room and library too. Then I ran round to the back of the house, and the housekeeper's room was alight behind. I run in at the kitchen door, and upstairs, and awoke one of the gardeners, and got them out. The place was so full of smoke, it was as much as we could do to get down. Then we got this long ladder, and put it against Mrs. Wilson's window, and got her and the girl down. Then we went round the other side, and I got up and broke a pane in Mr. Carne's window and shouted. I could not make him hear, so I broke another pane and unfastened the window and lifted it, and went in. I thought he must have been stifled in bed, for the smoke was as thick as possible, and I had to crawl to the bed. Well, master wasn't there. I felt about to see if he was on the floor, but I could find nothing of him; the door was open, and I expect he must have been woke up by the smoke, and went out to see what was the matter, and perhaps got choked by it. I know I was nearly choked myself by the time I got my head out of the window again."

"He may have got to the upper storey," Jacob Carey said. "We lind best keep a look out round the house so as to be ready to put the ladder up at once if we see him. There is nothing else to do, is there, Mr. Armstrong? You are accustomed to all sorts of troubles, and may know best what we ought to do."

"I can't think of anything," Mr. Armstrong "I have done it," he said. "I have broken the "Thave done it," he said. "I have broken the Curse of Carne's Hold."

The doctor stood up for a moment and said to one of the grooms standing close by, "Get a stable door off its hinges and bring it here; we will carry him into the gardener's cottage."

As soon as Reginald Carne was taken away, Mr. Armstrong and his daughter returned to the village. A few of the villagers followed their example; but for the most of them the fascination of watching the flames that were leaping far above the shell of the house was too great to be resisted, and it was not until the day dawned and the flames smoldered to a deep quiet glow that the crowd began to disperse. You are accustomed to all sorts of troubles, and may know best what we ought to do."
"I can't think of anything." Mr. Armstrong replied. "No, if he's not in his own room it seems hopeless to search for him. You see the flames have broken out from several windows of the first floor. My own idea is, from what you say as to the fire having spread into all the rooms on the ground floor when you discovered it, that the poor gentleman must have set fire to the house himself in half a dozen places, and as likely as not may have been suffocated aimost at once."

perse. "It has been a terrible scene," Mary said, as "It has been a terrible scene," Mary said, as they walked down the hill.
"A terrible scene, child, and it would have been just as well if you had stayed at home and siept comfortable. If I had thought that you were going to be so foolish I would not have gone myself."

"You know very well, father, you could not have helped yourself. You could not have sat quietly in our cottage with the flames dancing up above the tree time there if you had tried.

up above the tree tops there, if you had tried ever so much. Well, somehow I am glad that the Hold is destroyed; but of course I am sorry for Mr. Carne's death, for I suppose he will die."
"I don't think you need be sorry, Mary. Far

"I don't think you need be sorry, Mary. Far better to die even like that than to live till old age within the walls of a madhouse."

"Yes; but it was not the death, it was the horror of it."

"There was no horror in his case, my dear. He felt nothing but a wild joy in the mischief he had done. I do not suppose that he had a shadow of fear of death. He exulted both in the destruction of his house and in our inhibility to get at him. I really do not think that he is to be pitied, although it was a terrible sight to see him. No doubt he was carrying out a long-cherished idea. A thing of this sort does not develop all at once. He may for years have been broading over this unhappy taint of insanity in his blood, and have persuaded himself that with the destruction of the house, what the people here footishly call the Curse of the Carnes would be at an end."

"But surely you don't believe anything about

"All right, sir, all right," Jacob Carey shouted out at the top of his voice; "we will have a ladder for you in no time," and he and a score of men ran to lift the long ladder that was leaning against the side of the house. It was soon lowerel, brought round, and placed against the parapet close to where Recinald Carne was standing.

"Now then, sir," Jacob Carey shouted again, "it's all right. You can come down safe enough." But Mr. Carne paid no attention to the shout; he was pacing up and down along the parapet and was tossing his arms about in a strange manner. Suddenly he turned, seized the lad-der, and pushed it violently sideways along the narapet. Those below vainly tried to keep it "Look out," the smith shouted, "leave go what the people here loomsing call the Curse of the Carnes would be at an end."

"But surely you don't believe anything about the Curse, father?"

"Not much, Mary; the Curse was not upon the house, but in the insanity that the Spanish ancestors of the Carnes introduced into the family. Still, I don't know, although you may think me weak-minded, that I could assert conscientiously that I do not believe that there is anything in the Curse itself. One has heard of such things, and certainly the history of the Carnes would almost seem to justify the belief. Romald and his two sisters are, it seems, the last of those who have the Carne's blood in their veins, and anyhow Miss Carne's murder and Ronald's missfortunes do not seem to have anything whatever to do with the question of and clear out, or he will have it down on you."

The men holding the ladder dashed away from the foot, and the ladder fell with a crash upon the ground, while a peal of wild laughter broke out from above.

"The Squire has gone clean mad," Jacob Carey said to Mr. Armstrong, as he joined him: "either the fire has driven him mad, or, what is more likely, he went mad first and then lit the fire. However, we must save him if we can," anything whatever to do with the question of insanity. At any rate, dear, I, like you, am glad that the Hold is destroyed. I must own that I should not have liked the thought of your ever becoming its mistress, and indeed I have more than once thought that before I handed you over to Ronald, whenver that event might take place, I should insist on his making me a promise that should be survive his louisin and come into the Carnes' estates he would note into the Carnes' estates he would note into the Carnes' estates he would not making me a promise that should be survive his louisin and come into the Carnes' estates he would note into the Carnes' estates he would not the Carnes' estates he would not the Carnes' estates he would not the Carnes' estates he would note into the Carnes' estates he would not be survive he I would get up in the morning I would get wak, sick and miserable. I would do nothing for a while but cough and raise, and I would be so weak that I could hardly dress myself.

"I had no appetite. I would feel hungry but when I sat down to the table I could not touch a mouthful of food. If I did eat anything, my stomach was so weak it could scarcely retain any solid food. I would have a cold chilly feeling, which would immediately be succeeded by a high fever. My heart would beat hard and fast. Then it would beat slow and irregular, and there anything whatever to do with the question of "Look there, Carey, if we lifted the ladder and put it up between that chimney and the window next to it, he can't slide it either one way or another, as he did before; and he certainly could not throw it backward, if we plant the foot well away from the house,"

"That's right enough," the smith agreed, "but if he won't come down, he won't."

"We must go up and make him, Carey. If you and I and a couple of strong men go up together, we ought to be able to master him. Of course, we must take up rope with us and bind

"We might do than," the smith said, "but supposing the ladder catches fire?"
"The fire won't touch it at that point, Carey. You see it will go up just between the rows of "So it will; anyhow we might take up a long rope, if they have got one, so as to lower ourselves down if the ladder does catch fire." He spoke to one of the grooms. "Have you got plenty of rope?"

"l'enty," the man said. "I will fetch you a couple of long coils from the stables. Here, one of you, come along with me."

"Now we will get the ladder up," Mr. Armstrong said. the difficulty her father supposed in filling her letters. "It is nearly 4 o'clock." she said, as she entered the house and struck a light. "It is hardly worth while going to bed, father." "All right, my dear, you can please yourself. Now it is all over I acknowledge I feel both cold and sleepy, and you will see nothing more of me until between 10 and 11 o'clock in the morning."

"Oh, if you go to bed of course I shall not stop up by myself," Mary said; "but I am con-vinced that I shall not close an eye."
"And I am equally convinced, Mary, that in a little over half an hour you will be sound asieep," and in the morning Mary acknowl-edged that his anticipation had been verified.

"I don't mind going up, with some others to back me, to have a tussle with him on the roof; but he would knife us one by one as we got up to the parapet, and, though I don't think as I am a coward, I don't care about chucking away my life, which is of use to my wife and children, to save that of a madman whose life ain't of no use to hisself or anyone else."

"No, I don't see why you should, Carey," the doctor said; "the best plan will be to keep away from the ladder for the present. Perhaps when he thinks you are not going to make the attempt he will move away, and then we can get up there before he sees us. Reginald Carne stood guarding the ladder for a few minutes. By this time the whole of the first floor was in a blaze, the flames rushing out with four from every window. Seeing that he did not move, the dector said at last:

"Well, we must risk it. Give me a stick, Carey, and we will make a try, anyhow.

"You can't go now." Mr. Armstrong said, suddenly, "look, the ladder is alight."

This was indeed the case. The flames had not absolutely touched it, but the heat was so great that it had been slowly charring, and a light flame had now suddenly appeared, and in a moment 10 or 12 feet of the ladder was in flames. GEO. K. STEVENSON & CO. Are making a Handsome Display of

There was scarcely a word spoken among the little crowd of spectators on the lawn. Every moment was adding to their number as Mr. Volkes, the magistrate, and several other gentlemen rode up on horseback, and men ran up from all the farm bouses and cottages within a circle of a counie of miles. In fact I was actually driven to it." The speaker was Mr. John Getts, of No. 157 Liberty street, and is in the employ of Mr. Thomas Archibald, the well-known liveryman, whose extensive stables are located at 119 Third avenue. Mr. Getts is one of the oldest men in his line of business in the city, and is widely known among the business men of this city. The history of his experience, which is given below, will be of great interest, not only to his friends, but to the public in general. "I presume it was about two years ago that I first noticed that anything was wrong. Continued exposure to all kinds of weather, standing out in the rain at night, had often standing out in the rain at night, had often given me colds, but I paid no particular attention to them. Gradually, however, I noticed my head was stopped up. First one nostril would clog up and then the other. There would be a dull pain in my forehead. My eyes would get dim and watery. There would be sounds like ringing or regging in my ears. Gradually this ing or roaring in my ears. Gradually this trouble extended until my throat and chest were affected. There was a continual dropping back of matter from my head into my throat. I would be continually hawking and hemming to clear it of the meeus and phlegm. It became raw and inflamed. At one time my throat was so sore that I could not purtake of any solid food. I subsisted entirely on liquid nourishment, such as beef tea and broths, for over two weeks. My eyes grew worse, and my sight was so poor that I was obliged to wear eyeglasses. Sharp pains would take me in the chest, running

An ugly hacking cough got hold of me. My nights were the worst. I could not sleep. The matter that would drop down from my head to my throat, almost choked me. I coughed and coughed, and could get no rest at all. Night sweats came on and weakened me terribly. When I would get up in the morning I would feel weak, sick and miserable. I called on them and found their charges were very reasonable, and within my means. They didn't promise anything, but I felt sure they understood my case, and placed myself under their care. In a short time I noticed an improvement. The cough, night sweats and pains in my chest disappeared. My head and throat became clear and well. My eyes got strong, and I could do without my glasses. My appetite improved, and I could sleep well. Soon I was able to go to work again. I cain 'd rapidly in weight, and continued to improve in my general health. About the middle of last May Miss Lottie J. Forker, of 299 Arch street, Meadville, Pa., placed herself under treatment by mail with Drs. Copeland & Blair. In stating her case by letter just previous to the date above mentioned she complained of terrible headaches, followed by spells of vomiting, which would compel her to lie in bed for 24 hours, after which she would be completely worn out. Sharp pain in the breast, extending through to the shoulder blades, and followed by others in her stomach and side.

On June 9 she wrote: "Your medicine is doing me good, I do not feel so tired, and my head has only ached twice, and that was caused by a fresh coid I caught."

Some time ago Mr. M. C. Wilson, of Canonsburg, Pa., placed himself under treatment, by mail, with Drs. Copeland & Hiair. In stating his case by letter early in July, he complained of a full, heavy feeling in his head over the eyes, a bad taste in the mouth, coughing and raising phlegm, dimness of sight, sharp pains in the chest, with a tight, pinched feeling and soreness in the lungs, and a weak and shaky condition of the limbs.

July 25 he wrote: "I am improving steadily; feel ever so much better than I have in years."
